Websites often have no author, date, or title. APA provides guidelines for citing sources with missing information. How to cite a webpage with no author, date, or title in APA Style. Published on November 6, 2020 by Jack Caulfield. Revised on April 7, 2021. This article reflects the APA 7th edition guidelines. Click here for APA 6th edition guidelines. Webpage citations in APA Style consist of five components: author, publication date, title, website name, and URL. Unfortunately, some of these components are sometimes missing. The titling package provides various user-friendly ways to modify title pages. It provides the macros \thetitle, \theauthor and \thedata which can be reused anywhere in your document. I understand your question as follows: How can I access the values of the title, author, and date fields somewhere in the document. I suggest the following MWE as an answer, which dispenses with the need to use \makeatletter \makeatother outside of the preamble Titles of books and reports are italicized; titles of articles, chapters, and web pages are in quotation marks. APA style calls for capitalizing important words in titles when they are written in the text (but not when they are written in reference lists). A similar study was done of students learning to format research papers ("Using Citations," 2001). If no author or date is given, use the title in your signal phrase or the first word or two of the title in the parentheses and use the abbreviation "n.d." (for "no date"). The term title page is used to indicate the author, title and date information that can appear either on the front cover by itself or along the top of the first page of text. In order to do this, you must first specify the information. Once this information has been specified it can then be displayed. The author, title and date are entered using the commands : \author {} \title {
