Explores the development of thinking on leadership and places it in the context of the dominant discourses of the period in which studies were conducted. Argues that if a "sense making" paradigm is adopted, it becomes feasible to identify a model of leadership, which is relevant to the context of complexity and change facing organisations in the early twenty-first century. The model emerges when the measure of effectiveness is changed from organisational success to the impact of the leader on followers and on building of capability. The argument for such a shift is underpinned by the movement Insider Leadership. Building the 21st Century Leader. Heading up a successful company today is a lot different than it was 50 years ago. The abilities to innovate, execute and be a strong role model for your staff will always be essential. But in addition to these qualities, a new leadership style is emerging, with skills uniquely tailored for success in today's environment. The ideal management style for the 21st century, Bourgeois says, blends typical female and male traits--you'll need both intuition and a focus on the bottom line, both people skills and analytical strength. Collaborative Skills: The problems today's companies face can't be solved if department leaders stay in their own silos, says Cynthia McCauley, senior fellow at the Center for Creative Leadership in Greensboro, North Carolina. The 21st century requires all of these to be essential traits of leadership. Resilience: As mentioned before as a key implication, resilience is also going to be a much sought after trait amongst leaders in today's times. Further, leaders in the 21st century have another vital function i.e. they have to be the ideal role models for the coming generation and since anyone who has grown up over the last two decades would testify, they have been influenced by leaders from all occupations. For instance, it is common for people in their thirties now to admire and idolize business leaders like Steve Jobs, Bill Gates, Jack Welch, and NR Narayana Murthy. In the same way, the upcoming generation needs to have the current leaders of the business world as role models and hence a holistic approach that does not put profits before people all the time, that does not place undue emphasis on making money as the sole aim, and finally, the transformative power of business to solve social problems with the leaders taking. "Leaders of the 21st century need to go beyond achieving financial results to achieving enduring value for all constituencies served," says Cashman. Baldoni agrees. "Execution for results is the outcome of successful leadership.Â "Twenty-first century leaders might benefit from thinking of themselves as being in the center of a web rather than on top of a pyramid," he says. "Successful leaders will be those who can create, sustain and modify effective human capital and organizational strategies. As the business world becomes more horizontal and network-based, leaders will need to rely more on inspiration and influence rather than the exercise of command-and-control power."
