The Land of Remorse: A Study of Southern Italian Tarantism, by Ernesto De Martino, translated and annotated by Dorothy Louise Zinn. London, Free Association Books, 2005. This book focuses on the tarantism of the Salentine peninsula. He explores tarantism with a psychoanalytic focus on the individual crises related to adolescence, the dramatic losses of one of the parents or a forced marriage (Chapter three). He discusses the symbolic autonomy of the University of Bergamo, Italy. Tarantism is expressed. I argue that Italian vernacular religion was linked to a number of geographic, economic, religious, and social factors that were particular to the regions and towns in which it developed, but also partook of a broader cosmology that I am calling "the enchanted worldview." In this chapter, I will outline some of the parameters of this worldview and sketch its particulars, especially in the areas of vernacular healing, magic, and witchcraft. I also propose that American scholars reconsider historical approaches to the study of tradition, especially when these can shed light on how traditions change.
