Major works of postcolonial criticism have been produced by scholars in the fields of history, sociology, and political sciences. Primary influential works include Edward Said's Orientalism, whose thesis states that the West has misunderstood and misappropriated notions of the East or "Orient," its cultures, and its exemplars. Postcolonial criticism deals mainly with the literatures of Africa, Asia, and the Caribbean by analyzing the interactions between the culture, customs, and history of indigenous peoples and of the colonial power that governs. Postcolonial criticism is part of a larger field called cultural studies, or race and ethnicity studies. A critical analysis of the history, culture, literature and modes of discourse on the Third World countries in Africa, Asia, the Caribbean Islands and South America, postcolonialism concerns itself with the study of the colonization (which began as early as the Renaissance), the decolonization (which involves winning back and reconstituting the native cultures), and the neocolonising process (an aftermath. The major theoretical works in postcolonial theory include The Wretched of the Earth. Hybridity in postcolonial studies has been influenced by the work of political theorists like Will Kymlicka who posits a "multicultural citizenship" in the globalised world. Postcolonial Criticism is the analysis of how the era of post-colonial history affect our literature. For example, in Jane Eyre, we see example of post-colonial history come up with Mr. Rochester owning land in the colonies. In general, all books can be interpreted through post-colonial theory because colonialism brought on pandemics of racism which can still be found in our cultures and societies to this day. In fact, Toni Morrison, a famous writer and respected critic, wrote a paper on the absence of race, which we could connect to colonial theory (since colonialism brought on racism), and what that means. Post-colonial criticism? I wonder where that leaves me? I grew up and started school in England, in the 1950s, when the world was a very different place. Postcolonial theory is applied to political science, to history, and to other related fields. People who call themselves postcolonial scholars generally see themselves as part of a large (if poorly defined and disorganized) movement to expose and struggle against the influence of large, rich nations (mostly European, plus the U.S.) on poorer nations (mostly in the southern hemisphere). Taken literally, the term "postcolonial literature" would seem to label literature written by people living in countries formerly colonized by other nations. It is striking how little modern fiction from formerly colonized nations highlights the colonial past. Non-fiction writers often point out

Postcolonialism is the critical academic study of the cultural legacy of colonialism and imperialism, focusing on the human consequences of the control and exploitation of colonized people and their lands. More specifically, it is a critical theory analysis of the history, culture, literature, and discourse of (usually European) imperial power. Postcolonialism encompasses a wide variety of approaches, and theoreticians may not always agree on a common set of definitions. On a simple level, through anthropological study, it may seek to build a better understanding of colonial life based on the

MFS Modern Fiction Studies. Postcolonial Criticism: History, Theory and the Work of Fiction (review). Clarisse Zimra. In dealing with authors at the core of the current culture tussles, Postcolonial Criticism aims to teach us how to read or, rather, to re-read ourselves reading. Leery of the abstractions that have accompanied the semantic slippage of the postcolonial, Harrison intends, as he tells us with his first sentence, to shake loose from an academic canon in thrall to "colonialism and its wake" (1). To this end, he offers "case studies" on such key figures as Joseph Conrad by way of Chinua Achebe (chapters 1, "Colonialism and Colonial Discourse"). The critical response to their work has largely focused on their national appurtenances: are they critical of or complicit in the center? Postcolonial Theory and Criticism.
