

20/20: The Studio Museum in Harlem and Carnegie Museum of Art at the Carnegie Museum of Art

A monumental exhibit really adds to the discussion about race

by Bill O'Driscoll
November 15, 2017

Image courtesy of The Studio Museum in Harlem
Photo courtesy of Sasha J. Mendez
Lyle Ashton Harris' "Miss America"

Race is, rightly, America's inevitable issue, at or near the center of almost any discussion about almost anything. An art exhibit that advances that discussion more than pulls its weight, and so it is with 20/20: The Studio Museum in Harlem and Carnegie Museum of Art.

It's an amazingly rich exhibit, imaginatively co-curated by the Studio Museum's Amanda Hunt and the Carnegie's Eric Crosby, and including works by 20 artists from each institution. This big show about America features mostly artists who are African-American, and its keynote image is “Abe Lincoln’s First Book,” a 1944 oil painting by Horace Pippin depicting a juvenile Lincoln, abed in a rude log cabin in the dead of night, reaching for a tome by candlelight. The hopefulness embodied in this work made by an African-American veteran of World War I, born 23 years after the Civil War — its faith in humanity, and in learning — is startlingly poignant, all the moreso for its self-taught but careful technique.

Turn left to find Russian-born Louise Nevelson’s “Homage to Martin Luther King, Jr.” (1974–85), a looming wooden sculpture painted matte black whose disembodied architectural components evoke King’s incompleting work. Lyle Ashton Harris’ photograph “Miss America” (1987/88) depicts a young black woman in whiteface, an American flag draped across her shoulders above her bare breasts. It’s as if to ask, “Whose flag?” and “Whose country?” — even as, nearby, Jasper John’s iconic “Flag I” (1973) asks, existentially, “What is the flag?” and Glenn Ligon’s text-based painting “Prisoner of Love #1” (“We Are the Ink That Gives the White Page Its Meaning”) asks, “What is the country?”

The section of the exhibit titled “Working Thought” provokes trenchantly, with three of Titus Kaphar’s “Jerome” paintings of imprisoned black men, with icon-like gold-leaf backgrounds, their mouths gagged by swatches of tar. Samples from Melvin Edwards’ Lynch Fragments series (first sparked by the death of Emmett Till) are furious — wall-mounted balls of pain welded from railroad spikes, chains, industrial bolts — and so, still, are excerpts from Kara Walker’s now-canonical series “The Emancipation Approximation,” the silhouetted figures’ cartoonishness ironically contrasting the historic brutality of slavery. A 1984–85 collaboration between Jean-Michel Basquiat and Andy Warhol, an annotated dollar sign, sardonically riffs on divergent attitudes toward capitalism.

In the “American Landscape” section, Noah Davis’ 2008 painting “Black Wall Street” memorializes a 1921 race riot that leveled an affluent African–American community, with muted, dreamlike imagery centered on a forlorn woman in white gloves. The strip of empty turf in the foreground echoes the compositions in Zoe Strauss’ nearby photos of neglected urban neighborhoods (a “Half House,” graffiti reading “If you reading this fuck you”) — moats at once separating viewers from the scenes, and implicating them. Two photos by Braddock–born LaToya Ruby Frazier juxtapose urban disinvestment (not “decay”) with personal trauma.

The exhibit’s literal centerpiece pairs, for the first time, photos by storied Harlem–based photographer James VanDerZee and Pittsburgh’s legendary Charles “Teenie” Harris. Their 13 images each give us indispensable glimpses of worlds rarely seen in mainstream media: black middle–class life, in VanDerZee’s parlor portraits of individuals and families (1915–37), and mid–century black street life, from Harris’ kids at a swimming pool to a proud woman shop–owner in the Hill District.

Pittsburgh is repped too by Thaddeus Mosely’s characteristically elegant sculpture “Georgia Gate,” part of a “Shrine for the Spirit” section that also includes Barbara Chase–Riboud’s stunning “The Cape (La Manteau),” a monumental garment fashioned from small copper plates, and Thornton Dial’s wildly vibrant painting “The Soul of the Tiger.”

The final section, “Forms of Resistance,” includes: “Free, White and 21,” Howardena Pindell’s scathing 1980 video in which she recounts experiences with racism, and Eileen Gallagher’s “De Luxe,” an array of 60 prints of spoofishly amended pages from old African–American magazines, with ads for everything from new careers to wigs and skin–lightener. Collier Schorr’s “The First Lady (Diplomat’s Room, Rihanna, 20 Minutes),” based on an arresting fashion–spread shot of Michelle Obama, is meant to interrogate how we repurpose photographs, but might simply remind viewers that people of dignity once inhabited the White House.

The punning exhibit title 20/20 suggests hindsight, and much of this show is indeed retrospective, with works spanning nearly a century. But the final image you might see is among the newest. Kerry James Marshall's "Untitled (Gallery)" (2016) depicts a stylishly dressed, dark-skinned woman standing proudly (and spotlit) by a framed image of a naked woman laughingly sprawled on a fur. She might be the person in the photo; in any case, she owns it, even as rafters reflected in the photo frame's glass remind us of the bigger institution, one the woman likely doesn't control. Marshall concisely reminds us of the need to change our ideas about who's outside a discussion and who's inside.

At Pittsburgh's Carnegie Museum of Art, challenging visions of how we see America. Lorna is an artist very close to the Studio Museum's history. This is work that is not shying away from looking at black female subjectivity. She's reflecting our needs back toward us as an audience," says Hunt. "There are a number of text plaques that riff on the word line: color line, red line, out of line, this kind of thing. What line? Whose line?" asks Crosby. "I'm drawn to it in the context of this show, this reference of redlining and how financial institutions have used data in order to disenfranchise people of color. That's the reading she's evoking with this enigmatic image. It's an Wayfinding Signage Signage Design Carnegie Museum Of Art Art Museum Museum Exhibition Design Exhibition Stands African American Artist Graphic Design Studios Italian Art. Cho Cho San, Sydney. With my upcoming trip to Japan at the time I was in Australia I was keen on trying some more Japanese food in advance. When I walked by Cho Cho San the simplicity and beauty of the design of the re| Audrey Yang Interior. Space Interiors Office Interiors Cafe Interior Office Interior Design Commercial Design Commercial Interiors Best Office Small Office Glass Partition Wall. Studio Museum Artists in Residence 2019-20. Projects: Garrett Bradley. See What's On View. Black Refractions. Highlights from The Studio Museum in Harlem. Read Studio Magazine. Elliot Reed On Body And Performance. 2019-20 Artist in Residence Elliot Reed discusses his performance practice and using the body as a medium. E. Jane On Legends And Divas. 2019-20 Artist in Residence E. Jane discusses 90's R&B, Video Work, and Divas. Naudline Pierre On Color And Gesture In Painting. 2019-20 Artist in Residence Naudline Pierre discusses being in conversation with yourself, the burde

The Studio Museum in Harlem is an American art museum devoted to the work of artists of African descent. The Museum's galleries are currently closed in preparation for a building project that will replace the current building, located at 144 West 125th Street between Adam Clayton Powell Jr. Boulevard and Lenox Avenue in Harlem, Manhattan, New York City, with a new one on the same site. Founded in 1968, the museum collects, preserves and interprets art created by African Americans, members of the... At Pittsburgh's Carnegie Museum of Art, challenging visions of how we see America. Lorna Simpson, Dividing Lines, 1989. "Lorna is an artist very close to the Studio Museum's history. This is work that is not shying away from looking at black female subjectivity. She's reflecting our needs back toward us as an audience," says Hunt. "There are a number of text plaques that riff on the word line: color line, red line, out of line, this kind of thing. What line? Whose line?" asks Crosby. "I'm drawn to it in the context of this show, this reference of redlining and how financial institutions have used data in order to disenfranchise people of color. That's the reading she's evoking with this enigmatic image. It's an interesting play of languages." 20/20 draws together works from these important collections in dialogue. The exhibition unfolds through a thematic exploration of the foundations of our national condition, ultimately championing the critical role of art in political and individual expression. This exhibition is organized by Carnegie Museum of Art in partnership with The Studio Museum in Harlem and curated by Eric Crosby, Richard Armstrong Curator of Modern and Contemporary Art at Carnegie Museum of Art, and Amanda Hunt, former Associate Curator, The Studio Museum in Harlem, and now Director of Education and Public Programs, Museum of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles. Exhibition Images. Kerry James Marshall, Untitled (Gallery), 2016, Carnegie Museum of Art, The Henry L. Hillman Fund. July 22–December 31, 2017 Carnegie Museum of Art, Pittsburgh cmoa.org. Responding to a tumultuous and deeply divided moment in our nation's history, this exhibition brings together works by forty artists to offer a metaphoric picture of America today. Spanning nearly one hundred years, the show provides a unique opportunity to prompt conversations about the necessity of art during times of social and political transformation. Work by Ellen Gallagher is included.