The state of photojournalism in the age of digital media is precarious indeed, and Fred Ritchin's Bending the Frame: Photojournalism, Documentary, and the Citizen attempts a comprehensive reckoning with the many issues facing a socially engaged photographic field in pronounced technological flux and existential uncertainty. Like its subject, the book is exhilarating, informative, often very insightful, unpredictable, and at times a bit hasty, fragmented, and diffuse. Ritchin's premise is that with the digital we have entered into a radically new and uncertain photographic age, leaving behind a simpler world where the photojournalist functioned as the "societal scribe" who opened windows onto distant matters of concern and focused collective attention where needed.

"Citizen journalism has become a term widely used to characterise the democratization of vision, which the citizen has taken moral responsibility for a world over which he or she usually has little control, by ignoring the monolithic centralised power of broadcasting networks in favour of witnessing tactics that are often simpler and far more effective." By 2011 a year that began with the Arab uprisings and ended with Occupy Wall Street citizen photojournalism had become impossible to ignore. "Now our main stories are driven by images captured by citizens on the street, it's no longer just a supporting image" Al Jazeera's head of social media told the Guardian in 2011. "In most cases citizens capture the breaking news moments first."
